RESPECT FOR LIFE: HISTORY IS ON OUR SIDE

Recently, the Museum of London gallery marked the 200th anniversary of the abolition of the slave trade. The publicity material speaks of "obscene profits, horrific brutality" and how "the seeds of racism" were sown. The museum organizers regard slavery as a wholly evil thing.

Amazingly, on that same day a debate was held, in Britain, on justification for lowering the limit for abortion below the current 24 weeks. To do so, of course would go against those who argue that medical advances now make it easier for children born before 24 weeks to survive. Indeed, a baby born at 22 weeks, celebrated her first birthday the following day, photographed with her mother in the newspapers.

We can ask, how will abortion be viewed by museum curators, teachers, historians and moralists 200 years from now? As the slavery exhibition shows, something that one generation accepts readily enough is often seen as abhorrent by its descendants- so abhorrent, in fact, that people find it almost impossible to understand how it could have been countenanced in a supposedly civilized society.

How could people not see that Africans should not be bought and sold for the convenience of trade or domestic life? We reserve particular scorn for those who sought to justify slavery on moral grounds but still we can look at the moral blindness of the past, rather complacently.

It is not hard to imagine how a future Museum of London exhibition about abortion could go. It could buy up a 20th-century hospital building as its space, and take visitors around, showing them how, in one ward, staff were trying to save the lives of premature babies while, in the next, they were killing them. It could compare the procedure by which the corpse of a baby who had died after or during premature birth was presented by the hospital to the mother to assist with grieving, with the way a similar corpse, if aborted, was thrown away.

It could display the various instruments that were used to remove and kill the fetus, rather as the manacles and collars of slaves can be seen today. It could make a telling show of the propaganda that was used to promote abortion- the language of choice, control of a woman over her own body- and compare it with less happy information about the infertility caused by abortion, or depression or about the link between breast cancer and having an abortion before the birth of the first child.

It could show how women, vulnerable and often alone, came under pressure from the medical authorities to have an abortion without being offered alternative help. The museum could make a pretty devastating contrast between the marvelous growth of rights for the disabled, which began in the late- 20th century, and the fact the disability (or even mild deformity) of a child was always grounds for abortion.

Just as for pro-slavery politicians there could today be a rogues' gallery of pro-abortionists. Now of course, to some extent, such a museum of the future would be extremely unfair as we should not paint all those who disagree with us as callous. Many of those who support abortion have a deep concern about the horrors of an unwanted child, not realizing that the culture of abortion is one that promotes unwantedness.

We should be conscious of how genuinely difficult some of the situations of a pregnant woman can be. We should think more of help and less of condemnation. Much better for us to give practical assistance to hard-pressed mothers who do not abort their children than to only attack the abortion culture.

The future is that, with the passage of time, abortion, especially late abortion, is slowly coming to be seen as a "solution" dating from an era that is passing. It will therefore be discredited. Partly it is the effect of technology as we see in videos, from as far back as 1989 of the scan of babies at about 18 weeks showing heads and limbs. It bears the same relation to the technology today as do silent, black and white films to modern Hollywood hyper-realism.

Nowadays, it is even more visible and undeniable, as it was not to the first generation of people who had legal abortions, that what you are removing is human - human, though usually not in independent form, like you and I. It is also visible that this human entity is alive, and therefore that, by removing it, you are taking life.

One might try to say that this physical image should not make a difference to the moral case, but in practice it does. The famous anti-slavery image of a black man in chains, on his knees, saying, "Am I not a man and a brother?" was powerful because it used the physical to make a direct moral appeal: this person is essentially like you in body and soul, so why do you deny him the rights which you demand for yourself?

To see a fetus in the womb is to experience the same appeal. If you want to do people wrong, you must first undermine the idea that they are people. The Nazis called Jews rats. The Hutu in Rwanda called the Tutsis cockroaches. Pseudo-Darwinian views promoted ideas about racial purity or mental or physical health which allowed those who lacked these qualities to be seen as "inferior stock".

One of the good moral trends of our time has been to reject this way of looking at things. Instead, we insist, in the great debate about what it means to be human, that weakness is not a disqualification, but, by a famous Christian paradox, strength. Abortion runs against this trend, and so civilization will eventually reject it, as once it rejected slavery.
